

How Bob Bolter's Prisoner Escaped

Bob Bolter (as he has been familiarly termed in the Police Department for many years—he is now a resigned member, choosing neither to wear the red nor the white rose of the Plantagenet Commissioners) loves to take a quiet “drop” into my easy chair in the little study, and with a Romano cigar in one corner of his mouth, play narrator from the other side.

We were talking last week about the queer manner in which the French jailbird, “Parot,” got away from the Marshal, and I had irreverently sneered at the latter, when “Bob” cried, “Be easy, my boy! your prisoners will escape despite your best vigilance; so listen.”

“Several years ago I had with much difficulty arrested a clerk of a leading jewelry store, who for a long time had not only successfully purloined from his employers, but had as successfully diverted suspicion from himself. He made no confessions when apprehended, and was very sullen; but I got facts enough to give me a clew that the property he had taken was sold to the Ehrwitz Brothers, who for a series of years had defied by their finesse all the exertions of police and magistrates. After commitment he was ‘habeas corpused’—plague on those bothersome writs! Instead of being helps to justice, as in olden times, they have got to be mischievous, and oftentimes—as in the case I now speak of—mere dodges to help an escape. Being somewhat his criminal guardian, I was selected to care for him on his way to the judge’s chambers and back again. The argument over, he was remanded; for there was nothing in the points made ‘for the liberty of the subject,’ as the counselor with much bombast contended.

“Just by Pearl Street in Centre, as we were going to the Tombs, two intensely countrified fellows came along, and as quick as lightning seized me by each arm, and just as quickly my prisoner cut and ran toward Elm Street. The thing was so bold and audacious I was for a moment paralyzed, and they held tightly, too, I assure you. In an instant there was a crowd. ‘Help me,’ I cried, ‘I am an officer!’ The crowd came closer; the men released me. One said, ‘I’ll get an officer’; the other cried, ‘Oh, the fellow’s drunk’; and off they went, every body laughing like mad, and coming closer and closer around me. ‘Don’t be so affectionate,’ said I; ‘let me out of this’; and I made a lunge at a big fellow, and down he went. At this another struck me, and I saw at once that the whole thing, rescue, crowd, and all that, must be a premeditated dodge of the ‘Brothers’ aforesaid, who were protecting a pal, and had well watched the opportunity.

“My bird was gone, and, bottling my wrath, I said to myself, ‘Very well, gentlemen, you think I don’t know you; before nightfall, however, I’ll have both you and the prisoner tighter than the kettledrums at oratorios, or I’ll resign my office.’

“Slinking away, I went immediately to the office of an evening paper, and wrote a little bit of intelligence that — had escaped and was probably on his way to Philadelphia, and that Officer Bolter would take the afternoon train in pursuit. All a blind, of course. From there I instantly went to the store of a leading jeweler and told my story. He commiserated. 'Now,' said I, 'if you want to pity and aid me, lend me two diamond rings, four or five watches, and a case of chains. I pledge you my word they shall be back tomorrow.' 'Decoys?' said he, laughingly. 'Just so,' I returned; for he and I had served each other before. I left with my booty, saying as I did so, 'If you see in the paper that you have been robbed, tip the wink and humor it, you know.' He laughed, and off I bolted again to the newspaper office, and fortunately got there just as it was going to press. It was but the work of a moment to write a few lines speaking of a daring larceny in a jewelry store that morning, bold plunderers, etc., etc., etc., which, coupled with the escape, made the fourth edition of the paper a highly spicy issue. From there I went to the house of a particular partner in our police business. I told him at twelve o'clock precisely to be at No. — , — Avenue, with eight or ten men, and come in and make search. 'That is Ehrwitz's den,' says he; 'they're cunning; there'll be nothing found; we've tried that before.' 'Never you mind,' I rejoined, 'this time I'll be there before you and learn the mysteries.' With a sign of delighted recognition—for he loved a bit of excitement—we separated, he to pick his fellows, and I to put into my traveling bag the costume of a jaunty English cracksman, which had once before served as a good disguise—the sandy wig and whiskers, and check cravat were perfectly irresistible.

"By six o'clock, bag in hand, I was on board of the Jersey ferryboat. Said I to myself, 'Bob, my boy, somebody interested has seen that piece in the paper, and is watching to see if you go. Now you must find out who that somebody is.' Looking around over the crowd carelessly, it was sometime before I could venture a conjecture; but finally I lit upon a certain demure-looking parson as the spy. So, to try him with a bit of bait, I pulls out a stale telegraphic dispatch, and, holding it so he could see what it was, scanned it carefully with one eye, while with the other I peered over at him. He nibbled, and shortly edged toward my position. I was now almost sure, and only wanted a grain more into the scale to poise the doubt. So taking a favorable turn in the 'voyage,' I made over to him and said, 'Have you an evening paper? I omitted to buy one.' 'No, Sir,' said he; 'but you'll get one at the dépôt, I think.' I then pulled out my Philadelphia ticket, so as to carelessly show it—caught his eyes looking anxiously at it, and felt more convinced. But when, just as getting in the cars, I saw him whisper to another parsonish cove, and they both looked at me, I was sure of the spy. But, to my chagrin, he got on the cars and sat near me. I may be balked yet, I thought, for perhaps he is to follow me through! You may believe I was much relieved when he got off at Newark, where I had intended to stop, and so compelled me to go on New Brunswick, I had just twenty minutes to spare before the return train came by. I jumped for the hotel, where I was known—applied and got a room—and in ten minutes was the English cracksman! My own clothes were put into the carpetbag, and in a short time more I was back again for the city. At Newark my parson spy got in, and now I felt that I was right to a perfect certainty. Fortunately I had checked my bag, and it could lay until called for. So, unincumbered, I could operate with him as I chose. I took a bold position and sat down by him. We got into conversation. Presently I leaned over, and whispered meaningly, 'Don't be fly—I know you—you are Jack Simpson' (giving him the bold name of a bold pickpocket). He started, and then said, 'Sir, do you wish to insult me? I am the Rev. Mr. Jones.' 'Ah!' rejoined I, with my finger to my nose, 'and you preach for Moses Ehrwitz, the Polish fence, I believe?' He looked alarmed. 'Don't be afraid,' said I; 'I am Bob Mazy, the Liverpool faker. But since you are afraid to trust me, I will trust you. This very morning I took this jewelry' (producing the loaned articles), 'and was on my way to Philadelphia, when who should be on board but Bob Bolter. So I took return train from New Brunswick!' In an instant he took my hand with a meaning pressure, and told me who he was, and how nicely he had been watching the same officer, and how cleverly he was diddled, going off after his escaped prisoner. And then he laughed merrily; and, egad, I laughed too; but I leave you to judge who had the best of the joke!

"Joke, Sir! He was no sooner at Jersey City than I seized the constable, who is always about the place, whispered a word to him as to who I was, and then we both had our parson friend by the elbows, and took him, as snugly as you please and half frightened to death, into the Treasurer's little office. He had told me his name in the cars, and I had immediately perceived he was a very excellent cracksman, and a man whom we had long wanted. It was but a moment's work to undeceive him, to cove him, and to get a clean breast of all I wanted after a promise to let him go for his information. My friend the constable was to keep him until morning, when I would return and let him off.

"Armed with excellent information, I was soon on the New York side, and calling a carriage, rode within a block of the house of the Ehrwitz Brothers. Downstairs they kept a store, but upstairs I was satisfied they had a regular crib, merely using the counting room as a blind, and as a place in which to shove off articles that from their common use could not be well identified. They were just closing the store as I went in and asked for the elder. He made his appearance. I told him I wanted some private conversation. At this moment (it was now half-past eleven o'clock) my partner entered, most capitally disguised as a countryman, to make a pretended purchase and reconnoitre, and a meaning glance passed between us. He said out very loudly, 'Talk away, mine friend, I'sh got no private place but dish—talk away.' I whispered in his ear the name of the fellow who was then in durance vile in Jersey City. He started, and led the way upstairs. 'Vot of him?' said he, as he got upstairs. 'Why just this,' I answered, putting on a bold way—'I met him on the Jersey cars watching Bob Bolter, who stopped a little journey I was taking, and I turned around with this little swag'—and I produced the jewelry—'some I pulled this morning, and our friend said I couldn't do better than sell it to you. I suppose it's worth fifty dollars or so.' His caution in an instant succumbed to his avarice, and he took me into the third story, where he locked the door. 'Since you've made a clean bosom to me, I can trust you, mine fine fellow—for we are alone—you can never betray me—for dere is no corroborashun, and dat is where we are safe with you gentlemen! You did the leetle matter well; I read it in ze paper.' Saying this, and smothering a vulgar chuckle, he touched a little spring in the wall, and the false wainscot moved disclosing a space of two feet behind. I was almost thrown off my guard with joy, for I now saw that the whole villainy would be shortly at my disposal! From the recess he took a little box, and in it I saw much of the jewelry that I knew was taken by my escaped prisoner. But where was he? If I did not get him, however else I might succeed, I was not to be satisfied. I therefore angled for information, 'Bob Bolter I see has gone after the fellow who ran away so cleverly,' said I. 'All mine work,' he returned, 'for I always protect mine friends—mine true friends—but the 'copper' (slang for officer) will get ze toss up for his pains—ze bird is in dis cage,' and he pointed with his thumb upstairs. I could now scarcely conceal my delight. My heart thumped like a mill wheel, and the sweat poured from my body into my very stockings. He counted out his money (thinking, no doubt, what a fool I was), and just shut the wainscot when the church clock had by struck twelve.

“In a few minutes a noise was heard in the hall. My heart thumped louder. The old rascal was a little flurried, but only for a minute, when unlocking the door he said, ‘Perhaps a visit from the police—dey will not let an old man be (here he tipped a wink) and often incommode me. You (another wink) are an English peddler, you know, and—’ Here his hints were cut short as the door opened and in came our force, headed by the younger brother, who said: ‘It is no use—all is the same as when you were last here.’

“‘All is not the same,’ cried I, snatching off my wig. Down on the floor dropped the old rascal, as I touched the spring and open came the wainscot!

“Upstairs in a curious closet I found my prisoner; and altogether we recovered about eight thousand dollars’ worth of stolen goods. My first prisoner and my others are now enjoying the country air at Sing Sing; and there was a fine sing-sing on my own account the next day, I assure you.”

The Spirit of Democracy [Woodsfield, OH], October 14, 1857

Harper’s Weekly, July 25, 1857